Avebury by Night 3000BC By George Essence

It occurred to me that the giant mound circling the stones at Avebury might have had a purpose other than those normally proposed. Apparently the mound was originally a vertical bare chalk wall 60 feet high, and the rest of the site was also bare chalk. Chalk is extremely reflective, and a circular chalk "mirror" would focus the parallel light beams from the moon. My assumption is that the geometrical precision of the stones is carried into the profile of the 60 foot vertical chalk wall that surrounded them, that is, that the wall was designed as a lens.

The survey of Avebury made by A.Thom, (see below), shows that the perimeter stones are located precisely on circular arcs. The arcs connect at actual points instead of the small radius arcs normally found on stone circles.

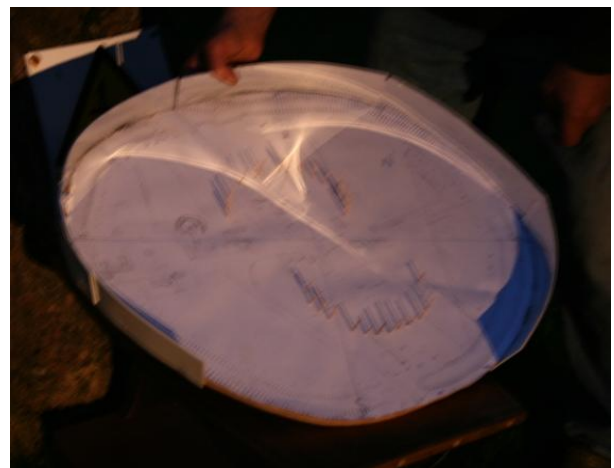

The key idea here is that the focussed image of the moon would be at half the radius of the mirror using the centres given by Thom. From this you can predict almost exactly where an image would be at any given time of night. It seems clear from the design geometry that any image will move dramatically around midnight. It would travel right across the circle from NW to SE, as if travelling across an image of the Milky Way. Many stone circles including Stonehenge are surrounded by chalk "walls", but according to Thom, Avebury is the only one with the precise cut off points that gave the dramatic midnight jump, the sudden switch of moonlight at midnight from one area of the circle to another.

To test my theory I expanded a general plan of the circle and its banks to make a 2 foot diameter profile which I then put onto a board (see above). I drilled small holes and used cocktail sticks where the interior circle stones are located. The model was made using the fact that the focal length is half the radius given by Thom, extended a few yards to allow for the width of the ditch. A remote car headlamp instead of the full moon was used to illuminate and represent the light pattern for a full moon at midnight (see below). The mirror is far too reflective, and too tall, but the white paper is probably not far off chalk.

One can only guess at what these ancient peoples were doing. One theory might be that they were creating an image mirror on the ground depicting the path of the soul. The soul was believed to travel via the North pole across the milky way to the ecliptic near Sirius, Taurus, Orion etc., to what was called the winter triangle. I believe the purpose of many stone-age rituals was to honour the idea of the second coming, Avebury at Night 3000BC continues on Page 4.

and these monuments were built to "save the world", by using a ritual similar to the one used by the Hopi of Arizona today.

Their story tells of a "mortal god" who had recently [3000 AD] died who escaped from the Underworld and who would be making his way through uncharted territory back to the stars. He [his "soul"] would travel via the North Pole across the "Milky Way" to Orion whence it had originally come. If he succeeded then he would return as his own "son", ["the second coming" in 0 AD, the start of Pisces] and save the souls of his children [us!]

In fact you can read the whole of this story as retold 3000 years later by the Hopi, from the Hopi Pictograph in Arizona which also includes the sequel, where the god is shown after his adventures saving humans from the underworld.

Evidence for the Orion origin of souls and the presence of this god can be found on a funerary jar from the Nazca plateau in Peru dated [0AD]. The whole of South America is in fact full of similar references to this god. For further information email George at geo.essence@hotmail.co.uk
