

Our Real Home

(A talk addressed to an ageing lay-disciple approaching her death)

By the Venerable Ajahn Chah

Now determine in your mind to listen with respect to the Dhamma. During the time that I am speaking, be as attentive to my words as if it was the Lord Buddha himself sitting in front of you. Close your eyes and make yourself comfortable, compose your mind and make it one pointed. Humbly allow the triple gem of wisdom, truth and purity to abide in your heart as a way of showing respect to the enlightened one.

Today I have bought nothing material of any substance to offer you, only Dhamma, the teachings of the Lord Buddha. Listen Well. You should understand that even the Buddha himself with his great store of accumulated virtue, could not avoid physical death. When he reached old age he relinquished his body and let go of its heavy burden. Now you too must learn to be satisfied with the many years you have already depended upon your body. You should feel that it is enough.

You can compare it to the household utensils you've had for a long time – your cups, saucers, plates and so on. When you first had them they were clean and shining, but now after using them for so long, they're starting to wear out. Some are already broken, some have disappeared and those that are left are deteriorating, they have no stable form – and it's their nature to be like that. Your body is the same way: it's been continually changing right from the day you were born, through childhood and youth, until now it's reached old age. You must accept that. The Buddha said that conditions (sankharas) – whether they are internal conditions or bodily conditions – are not self; their nature is to change. Contemplate this truth until you see it clearly.

This very lump of flesh that lies here in decline is saccadhamma, the truth. The truth of this body is saccadhamma, and it is the unchanging teaching of the Buddha. The Buddha taught us to look at the body, to contemplate it and come to terms with its nature. We must never be at peace with the body, whatever state it is in. The Buddha taught that we should ensure that it's only the body that is locked up in jail and not let the mind be imprisoned along with it.

Now as your body begins to run down and deteriorate with age, don't resist that – but don't let your mind deteriorate with it. Keep the mind separate. Give energy to the mind by realising the truth of the way things are. The Lord Buddha taught that this is the nature of the body, it can't be any other way: having been born, it gets old and sick and then it dies. This is a great truth you are presently encountering. Look at the body with wisdom and realise it.

Even if your house is flooded or burnt to the ground, whatever the danger that threatens it, let it concern only the house. If there's a flood, don't let it flood your mind. If there's a fire, don't let it burn your heart, let it be merely the house, that which is external to you, that is flooded and burned. Allow the mind to let go of its attachments. The time is ripe.

You've been alive for a long time. Your eyes have seen any number of forms and colours, your ears have heard so many sounds, you've had any number of experiences. And that's all they were – just experiences. You've eaten delicious foods, and all the good tastes were good tastes, nothing more. The unpleasant tastes were just unpleasant tastes, that's all. If the eye sees a beautiful form, that's all it is just a beautiful form. An ugly form is just an ugly form. The ear hears an entrancing melodious sound and it's nothing more than that. A grating, disharmonious sound is simply so.

The Buddha said that rich or poor, young or old, human or animal, no being in this world can maintain itself in any one state for long: everything experiences change and estrangement. This is a fact of life that we can do nothing to remedy. But what the Buddha said is what we can do is to contemplate the body and mind so as to see their impersonality, see that neither of them is "me" or "mine". They merely have provisional reality. It's like this house: it's only nominally yours, you couldn't take it with you anywhere. It's the same with your wealth, your possessions and your family – they're all yours only in name, they don't really belong to you, they belong to nature.

The truth doesn't apply to you alone: everyone is in the same position, even the Lord Buddha and his enlightened disciples. They differed from us in only one respect and that was in their acceptance of the way things are; they saw that there could be no other way.

So the Buddha taught us to scan and examine this body, from the soles of our feet to the crown of our head and then back down to the feet again. Just take a look at the body. What sort of things do you see? Is there anything intrinsically clean there? Can you find any abiding essence? The whole body is steadily degenerating, and the Buddha taught us to see that it doesn't belong to us. It's natural for the body to be this way, because all conditioned phenomena are subject to change. How else would you have it be? Actually, there's nothing wrong with the way the body is. It's not the body that causes your suffering; it's your wrong thinking. When you see the right wrongly there is bound to be confusion.

It's like the water of a river. It flows naturally down the gradient; it never flows against it, that's its nature. If a person was to go and stand on a river bank and, seeing the water flowing swiftly down its course, foolishly want it to flow back up the gradient, he would suffer. Whatever he was doing, his wrong thinking would allow him no peace of mind. He would be unhappy because of his wrong view, thinking against the stream. If he had right view he would see that the water must inevitably flow down the gradient; and until he realised and accepted that fact, the person would be upset and agitated.

The river that must flow down the gradient is like your body. Having been young your body's now become old, and now its meandering towards its death. Don't go wishing it was otherwise, it's not something you have the power to remedy. The Buddha told us to see the way things are and then let go of our clinging to them.

Take this feeling of letting go as your refuge. Keep meditating, even if you feel tired and exhausted. Let your mind dwell with the breath. Take a few deep breaths, then establish the mind on the breath using the mantra 'Buddho'. Make this practice habitual. The more exhausted you feel the more subtle and focused your concentration must be, so that you can cope with the painful sensations that arise. When you start to feel fatigued, then bring all your thinking to a halt; let the mind gather itself together and then turn to knowing the breath. Just keep up the inner recitation: 'Buddho, Buddho'. Let go of all externals. Don't go grasping at thoughts of your children and relatives, don't grasp at anything whatsoever. Let go. Let the mind unite at a single point and let that composed mind dwell with the breath. Let the breath be its sole object of knowledge. Concentrate until the mind becomes increasingly subtle until feelings are insignificant and there is great inner clarity and wakefulness. Then when painful sensations arise they will gradually cease of their own accord.

Finally you'll look on the breath as if it was a relative come to visit you. When a relative leaves, we follow let him out and see him off. We watch until he's walked or driven out of sight and then go back indoors. We watch the breath in the same way. If the breath is coarse, we know that it's coarse, if it's subtle we know that it's subtle. As it becomes increasingly fine we keep following it, while simultaneously opening the mind. Eventually the breath disappears altogether and all that remains is the feeling of wakefulness. This is called meeting the Buddha. We have that clear wakefulness that is called 'Buddho': the one who knows; the one who is awake, the radiant one. It is meeting and dwelling with the Buddha, with knowledge and clarity. For it was only the historical flesh and blood Buddha that entered Parinibbana (final or ultimate liberation which takes place at the death of the physical body of an enlightened one). The true Buddha, the Buddha that is clear radiant knowing, we can still experience and attain today, and when we do the heart is one.

So let go, put everything down, everything except the knowing. Don't be fooled if visions or sounds arise in your mind during meditation. Put them all down. Don't take hold of anything at all. Just stay with this non dual awareness. Don't worry about the past or the future, just be still and you will reach the place where there's no advancing, no retreating and no stopping, where there's nothing to grasp on to or cling to. Why? Because there is no self, no 'me' or 'mine' it's all gone. The Buddha taught us to be emptied of everything in this way, not to carry anything with us. To know and having known to let go.

Realising the Dhamma, the path to freedom from the round of birth and death, is a job we all have to do alone. So keep trying to let go, and to understand the teachings. Really put effort in to your contemplation. Don't worry about your family. At the moment they are as they are, in the future they will be like you. There's no one in the world who can escape this fate.

The Buddha told us to put down everything that lacks a real abiding substance. If you put everything down you will see the truth; if you don't, you won't. That's the way it is and it's the same for everyone in the world. So don't worry and don't grasp at anything.

Even if you find yourself thinking, well that's all right too, as long as you think wisely. Don't think foolishly. If you think of your children, think of them with wisdom, not with foolishness. Whatever the mind turns to, then think and know that thing with wisdom, then you let it go and there's no suffering. The mind is bright, joyful and at peace, and turning away from distractions it is undivided. Right now what you can look to for help and support is your breath.

This is your own work, nobody else's. Leave others to do their own work. You have your own duty and responsibility and you don't have to take on those of your family. Don't take anything else on, let it all go. That letting go will make your mind calm. Your sole responsibility right now is to focus your mind and bring it to peace. Leave everything else to others. Forms, sounds, odours, tastes – leave them to others to attend to. Put everything behind you and do your own work, fulfil your own responsibility. Whatever arises in your mind; be it fear or pain, fear of death, anxiety about others or whatever; say to it: 'Don't disturb me. You're not my business anymore.' Just keep saying this to yourself then you see those dhammas arise.

What does the word 'dhamma' refer to? Everything is a dhamma. There is nothing that is not a dhamma and what about the world? The world is the very mental state that is agitating you at this moment. 'What will this person do? When I'm dead, who will look after them? How will they manage?' This is all just 'the world'. Even the mere arising of a thought of fearing death or pain is the world.

Throw the world away! The world is the way it is. If you allow it to arise in the mind and dominate consciousness then the mind becomes obscured and can't see itself. So, whatever appears in the mind, just say: 'This isn't my business; it's impermanent, unsatisfactory and not self'.

Thinking you'd like to go on living for a long time will make you suffer. But thinking you'd like to die right away or die very quickly isn't right either – it's suffering isn't it? Conditions don't belong to us they follow their own natural laws. You can't do anything about the way the body is. You can prettify it a little, make it look attractive and clean for a while – like the young girls who paint their lips and let their nails grow long – but when old age arrives everyone's in the same boat. That's the way the body is, you can't make it any other way. But what you can improve and beautify is the mind.

Anyone can build a house of wood or bricks, but the Buddha taught that that sort of home is not our real home, it's only nominally ours. It's a home in the world and it follows the ways of the world.

Our real home is inner peace. An external material home may well be pretty, but it is not very peaceful. There's this worry and then that, this anxiety and then that. So we say it's not our real home, it's external to us, sooner or later we'll have to give it up. It's not a place we can live in permanently because it doesn't truly belong to us it's part of the world.

Our body is the same: we take it to be self, to be 'me' and 'mine', but in fact it's not really so at all, it's another worldly home. Your body has followed it's natural course from birth, until now it's old and sick – and you can't forbid it from doing that, that's the way it is. Wanting it to be different would be as foolish as wanting a duck to be like a chicken. When you see that that's impossible that a duck has to be a duck and a chicken has to be a chicken and that bodies get old and die – you will find strength and energy. However much you want the body to go on and last for a long time it won't do that.

The Buddha said:

Anicca vata sankhara (all conditioned things are transient)

Uppada vayadhammino (arising and ceasing is their nature)

Upajjhiva nirujhanti (having arisen they will cease)

Tesam vupasamo sukho (calming, ceasing – true happiness)

The word 'sankhara' refers to this body and mind. Sankharas are impermanent and unstable. Having come in to being they disappear, having arisen they pass away – yet everyone wants them to be permanent. This is foolishness. Look at the breath. Having come in it goes out: that's it's nature, that's how it has to be. The inhalation and exhalation have to alternate, there must be change. Sankharas exist through change, you can't prevent it. Just think: could you exhale without inhaling? Would it feel good? Or could you just inhale? We want things to be permanent but they can't be it's impossible. Once the breath has come in, it must go out: when it's gone out it comes in again – and that's natural isn't it? Having been born we get old and sick and then we die, and that's totally natural and normal. It's because Sankharas have done their job, because the in-breaths and out-breaths have alternated in this way that the human race is still here today.

As soon as we are born we are dead. Our birth and our death are just one thing. It's like a tree: when there's a root there must be twigs. When there are twigs there must be a root. You can't have one without the other. It's a little funny to see at death how people are so grief stricken and distracted, tearful and sad, and at birth how happy and delighted. It's delusion; nobody has ever looked at this clearly. I think if you really want to cry, then it would be better to do so when some one is born. For actually birth is death, death is birth; the root is the twig, the twig the root. If you've got to cry, cry at the root, cry at the birth. Look closely: if there was no birth there would be no death. Can you understand this?

Don't think a lot. Just think: 'This is the way things are.' It's your work, your duty. Right now nobody can help you, there's nothing that your family and your possessions can do for you. All that can help you now is the correct awareness. So don't waver. Let go. Throw it all away.

Even if you don't let go, everything is starting to leave anyway. Can you see that, how all the different parts of your body are trying to slip away? Take your hair: when you were young it was thick and with colour; now it's falling out. It's leaving. Your eyes used to be good and strong. Now they are weak and your sight is unclear. When the organs have had enough they leave, this isn't their home. When you were a child your teeth were healthy and firm; now they're wobbly, perhaps you have false ones? Your eyes, ears, nose, tongue – everything is trying to leave because this isn't their home. You can't make a permanent home in a sankhara; you can stay for a while and then you have to go. It's like a tenant watching over his tiny little house with failing eyes. His teeth aren't so good, his ears aren't so good, his body's not so healthy; everything is leaving.

So you needn't worry about anything, because this isn't your real home, it's just a temporary shelter. Having come in to this world, you should contemplate it's nature. Everything there is, is preparing to disappear. Look at your body. Is there anything there that is in it's original form? Is your skin as it used to be? Is your hair? It's not the same is it? Where has everything gone? This is nature, the way things are. When their time is up, conditions go their way. The world is nothing to rely on – it's an endless round of disturbance and trouble; pleasures and pain. There's no peace.

When we have no real home we are like an aimless traveller out on the road, going this way for a while and then that way, stopping for a while and then setting off again. Until we return to our real home we feel ill at ease whatever we are doing, just like the one who has left his village to go on a journey. Only when he gets home again can he really relax and be at ease.

No where in the world is any real peace to be found. The poor have no peace and neither do the rich. Adults have no peace, children have no peace, the poorly educated have no peace and neither do the highly educated. There is no peace anywhere that is the nature of the world.

Those who have few possessions suffer and so do those who have many. Children, adults, the aged...everyone suffers. The suffering of being old, the suffering of being young, the suffering of being wealthy, and the suffering of being poor – it's all nothing but suffering.

When you've contemplated things in this way you'll see anicca, impermanence, and dukkha, unsatisfactoriness. Why are things impermanent and unsatisfactory? It's because they are anatta, not-self.

Both your body that is lying here sick and painful, and the mind that is aware of it's sickness and pain, are called dhammas. That which is formless-the thoughts, feelings and perceptions – is called nama-dhamma. That which is racked with aches and pains is called rupadhamma. The material is dhamma and the immaterial is dhamma. So we live with dhamma, in dhamma, we are dhamma. In truth there's no self anywhere to be found, there is only dhamma continually rising and passing away, as is it's nature. In every single moment we are experiencing birth and death. That's the way things are.

When we think of the Lord Buddha, how truly he spoke, we feel how worthy he is of salutation, reverence and respect. Whenever we see the truth of something, we see his teachings, even if we have never practised Dhamma. But even if we have knowledge of the teachings, have studied and practised them, but still haven't seen their truth, then we are still homeless.

So understand this point, that all people, all creatures, are about to leave. When beings have lived and appropriate time they go their way. The rich, the poor, the young, the old, all beings must experience this change.

When you realise that that's the way the world is you'll feel that it's a wearisome place. When you see that there's nothing stable or substantial you can rely on, you'll feel wearied and disenchanted.

Being disenchanted doesn't mean you're averse, though. The mind is clear. It sees that there's nothing to be done but to remedy this state of affairs; it's just the way the world is. Knowing in this way, you can let go of attachment, let go with a mind that is neither happy nor sad, but at peace with sankharas through seeing their changing nature with wisdom.

Anicca vata sankhara – all sankharas are impermanent. To put it simply, impermanence is the Buddha. If we see an impermanent phenomenon really clearly, we'll see that it's permanent – permanent in the sense that its subjection to change is unchanging. This is the permanence that living beings process. There is continual transformation, from childhood through youth to old age, and that very impermanence, that nature to change, is permanent and fixed. If you look at it like that your heart will be at ease. It's not only you who has to go through all this, it's everyone.

When you consider things thus, you'll see them as wearisome, and disenchantment will arise. Your delight in the world of sense pleasures will disappear. You'll see that if you have a lot of things, you have to leave a lot behind: if you have a few then you will leave behind few. Wealth is just wealth, long life is just long life, nothing special.

What's important is that we should do as the Lord Buddha taught and build our own home, building it by the method that I've been explaining to you. Build your own home. Let go. Let go until the mind reaches the peace that is free from advancing, free from retreating and free from stopping still. Pleasure is not our home, pain is not our home. Pleasure and pain both decline and pass away.

The great teacher saw that all sankharas are impermanent, and so he taught us to let go of our attachment to them. When we reach the end of our life, we'll have no choice anyway; we won't be able to take anything with us. So wouldn't it be better to put things down before that? They're just a heavy burden to carry around; why not throw off that load now? Why bother to drag them around? Let go, relax, and let your family look after you.

Those that nurse the sick grow in goodness and virtue. One who is sick and giving others that opportunity shouldn't make things difficult for them. If there's pain or some problem or other, let them know, and keep the mind in a wholesome state. One who is nursing parents should fill his or her mind with warmth and kindness, not get caught in aversion. This is the one time you can repay the debt you owe them. From your birth through your childhood, as you've grown up, you've been dependent on your parents. That we are here today is because our mothers and fathers have helped us in so many ways. We owe them an incredible debt of gratitude.

So today, all of you children and relatives gathered here together, see how your parents have become your children. Before, you were their children; now they become yours. They become older and older until they become children again. Their memories go, their eyes don't see so well and their ears don't hear; sometimes they garble their words. Don't let it upset you. All of you nursing the sick must know how to let go. Don't hold on to things, just let go and let them have their own way. When a young child is disobedient, sometimes the parents let them have their own way just to keep the peace, to make it happy. Now your parents are like that child. Their memories and perceptions are confused. Sometimes they muddle up your names, or you ask them to give you a cup of tea and they bring a plate. It's normal, don't be upset by it.

Let the one being cared for remember the kindness of those who nurse, and patiently endure the painful feelings. Exert yourself mentally, don't let the mind become scattered and agitated, and don't make things difficult for those looking after you. Let those who nurse the sick fill their minds with virtue and kindness. Don't be adverse to the unattractive side of the job, to cleaning up mucus and phlegm, or urine and excrement. Try your best. Everyone in the family give a hand.

These are the only parents you've got. They gave you life, they have been your teachers, your nurses and your doctors – they've been everything to you. That they have bought you up, taught you, shared their wealth with you and made you their heirs are the great beneficences of parents. Consequently the Buddha taught the virtues of katannu and katavedi, knowing our debt of gratitude and trying to repay it. These two dhammas are complementary. If your parents are in need, if they are unwell or in difficulty, then we do our best to help them. This is katannu-katavedi, it is a virtue that sustains the world. It prevents families from breaking up; it makes them stable and harmonious.

Today I have bought you the Dhamma as a gift in this time of illness. I have no material things to give you – there seem to be plenty of those in the house already – and so I give you Dhamma something which has a lasting worth, something you'll never be able to exhaust. Having received it from me you can pass it on to a many others as you like, and it will never be depleted. That is the nature of truth, I have been happy to give you this gift of Dhamma and I hope it will give you strength to deal with your pain.
